

It's terrible isn't it? They really need to do something about this otherwise there's going to be hell to pay, I've never seen traffic like it. I tell you what, if they'd planned things out properly to begin with then we wouldn't have a traffic problem at all, would we? I knew this bloke that lived in Sharjah and he blew his own brains out rather than face the daily drive in to work. An awful mess, really. They couldn't sell the car afterwards, of course. But I mean, you could understand him some days, couldn't you? It's at least an hour and a half if not longer each way every day. Do you think the Metro will make the difference they thought it would? I can't see how it will work myself, but this Salik thing does show what they can do I mean we didn't think it could work at all, did we Emily? No, but then they used this arfid thing and that meant you didn't have to stop for the toll and I reckon they could learn a thing or two from these boys over on the Severn Bridge, don't you? Anyway where did you come in from? Really? Take long? Thought so. It is bad, isn't it? Mind you, you're better off than that poor bloke in Sharjah! Did I tell you about him? Oh right. Well I'm not really complaining myself because of course we haven't got much of a journey really in from the Ranches these days although we really could use those roadworks on the Emirates Road being finished because it can get very iffy indeed up there, 'specially with that long line of trucks that's always coming up from Jebel Ali in the morning and down to it in the evening. That's because they ban 'em from the city during the day. Of course, the RTA's to blame - and did you see these cheeky ads they've done talking about how smart they are? I don't think so! I mean just look at that floating bridge. What a disaster that was! Anyway. Did I tell you about this bloke I know in Sharjah?
